Tajikistan

... where the Silk Road confronts
the Pamir Mountains

A weathered sign indicated my altitude as I crossed Tajikistan's Ak-Baital Pass – 4,655 metres above sea level.

Barren mountains stretched away from me in every direction, casting their shadows over the second-highest international road in the world. China was just over the eastern horizon. The plains and valleys of Kyrgyzstan were behind me. To the south lay Afghanistan, the Hindu Kush Mountains and the fabled Wakhan Corridor.

I was heading south, along the Pamir Highway, once part of the Silk Road but now officially known as the M41. Rightly celebrated as one of the planet's most intrepid road trips, this 2,038-kilometre-long road winds its way from the plains of Central Asia through the heart of the High Pamir Mountains, along the Panj River that marks the Tajik-Afghan border, and through to Dushanbe, one of the world's newer capital cities.

My destination was Tajikistan, still an isolated land of breathtaking scenery, amazing traditions and colourful markets, just like it was when the ancient traders of the Silk Road travelled along this same road. It is where Russia's expansion confronted Britain's defence of India during the Great Game of the 19th century, the area that later became the most southerly republic of the Soviet Union.

This richly illustrated talk will share Stephen's experiences of two recent trips through Tajikistan – surely one of the world's least known but most fascinating countries.
